Career Of The Week

Lobbyist

What you'll do

Your main aim is to influence the government or to help others to influence the government. You'll advise your clients on policies and processes, and represent their views to Parliament.

You might:

- help clients understand legal or political processes and help them build a strategy to improve those processes
- investigate when new legislation is due to be released and support clients in preparing a response
- provide information and strategic direction to clients or government agencies
- organise meetings between clients and government departments
- attend party and committee conferences
- read reports and information produced by government agencies, NGOs, Think Tanks, charities, and other agencies
- write press releases, articles, reports, newsletters, and digital content
- work directly with politicians or civil servants

You will also need to follow the Chartered Institute of Public Relations' code of conduct.

You could work at:

- an independent consultancy
- a public relations organisation
- an NGO or charity
- a Think Tank
- a pressure group
- a government agency

You may also work 'in-house', meaning you lobby the government to change policies in line with a private employer's aims and missions, for example, to stop testing cosmetics on animals.

You could become a freelance lobbyist after you have enough experience.

Record relevant activities you've already done on the Activities tool

Working hours and environment

Most lobbyists work a 37-40 hour week, though you may need to work extra hours in the lead up to a campaign or deadline. You will also be busier at different points of the year depending on parliamentary recesses and processes.

If you choose to work as a freelance lobbyist, you set and work your own hours.

Career path and progression

Your career path depends on where you choose to work.

For example, in a consultancy firm, you will follow a clear structure from junior, to manager, to associate, to senior where you'll bring in new clients. Whereas, in a public affairs department, the progression is less certain but you may be able to move into policy advising or into other political roles.

Skills required

You'll need:

- strong written and verbal communication skills
- confidence in public speaking and speaking out against a majority
- strong research and analysis skills
- the ability to work with lots of different types of people
- enthusiasm, resilience, and perseverance
- the ability to analyse problems and build a strategy to overcome them
- cultural sensitivity

Got evidence of these skills? Record your examples on the Skills tool

Entry requirements

There are no official entry requirements, however most organisations will expect you to have a degree in politics, international relations, social policy, law, business studies, or languages.

Senior positions may require a postgraduate qualification in politics, government, or public relations.

You will also need to have significant work experience either through shadowing local government or a consultancy firm, or through voluntary social impact work - for example, with your school, college, or university's council or politics society.
